Combining multiple command line options into one group In Python, I have a script that takes a number of options. These options get passed into the script through the command line. `options = "action=process;file=%s" % file` However, I would like to combine the options into one string. This is because I will need to perform a single lookup and process the options. `# we get these options from the command line action=process file=foo.tar.gz # now I will need to figure out the action # based on the file contents action = "process" # 'process' action = 'put_in_somewhere' # 'put_in_somewhere'` I could potentially accomplish this, but using a number of `if/elif/else` blocks with an enormous amount of unnecessary repetition. Is there a Pythonic way to do this? A: Given that `action` is required to be unique in your example, I'd suggest: `actions = {'process': 'process', 'put_in_somewhere': 'put_in_somewhere'}` `# this will also work: # actions = {'process': 'put_in_somewhere'}` `action = actions.get(action, 'unknown_action')` You could then perform the lookup like this: `print("action is:", action, "for file:",` file) Note: the code could be simplified by passing dict instead of a string. A: I'd use a dictionary options = { ba244e880a
