Growth and temperature effects on photosystem I in Streptomyces coelicolor A3(2). Streptomyces coelicolor has two major photosynthetic membranes, the cytoplasmic membrane and the external one, the former consisting of phospholipids only. The structural and functional analysis of the external membrane is complicated by its occlusion with the cell wall. To circumvent this problem, the effects of various physical and chemical treatments of S. coelicolor were investigated on the photosynthetic membranes and growth. Treatment of cells with Triton X-100 increased the absorbance of the light-harvesting chlorophyll a/b antenna complexes, but it did not change the temperature response of the flash-induced absorbance increase. Neither Triton X-100 nor EDTA treatment had any effect on the thermal dissipation response, but they did increase the state 1 fluorescence (F_0) of the reaction centers, without changing the kinetics of their inactivation. The only change in protein structure induced by Triton X-100 treatment is the increased labeling of a polypeptide of about 33 kDa, but this protein did not seem to have a role in the thermal stability of the reaction centers. Extraction of cells with hot SDS destroyed the photosynthetic membranes and prevented their recovery by resuspension in buffer. The temperature dependence of the photosystem I fluorescence changes was not altered, although the thermal dissipation responses were lost. Therefore, SDS treatment did
