Leprosy, or Hansen's disease, is a chronic bacterial infectious disease caused by Mycobacterium leprae or Mycobacterium lepraemurium. The mycobacterial presence leads to non-specific signs and symptoms in the skin and peripheral nervous system and a decline in organ function. Extra-motor manifestations such as peripheral neuropathy and diabetes mellitus, ocular signs including uveitis and neuroretinitis, and behaviour disturbances including depression and dementia are common. Other features of the disease are impaired joint function, mental problems, and deformities of the extremities that lead to disability. The disabilities associated with leprosy result from long-term infection, which causes permanent damage to the nervous system and other organ systems, resulting in loss of sensory and motor function, peripheral and autonomic neuropathy, peripheral nerve injury, and reduced organ function. The consequences of these disabilities include a loss of independence in activities of daily living, reduced quality of life, and lower community participation and productivity. This article presents a review of the available literature on the clinical characteristics and the chronic disability caused by leprosy.
