I'm working with PHP and I'm trying to stream images using HTTP requests (as I'm in a proxy I can't use gzip). From the HTTPProtocol docs, it seems that: $data = $socket->recv($size, $flags); will buffer the headers and the body of the request and will only send them once the client is at the end of the headers/body and before the next request. while $buffer = pack('C*', $boundary); will send the headers and the body of the request in one go. The first approach seems to be preferred and will be the reason why I get buffered images. However, when I run: recv($buffer); $socket->end(); I get the output in my browser as: 7 312 918 How can I properly end my stream? A: The answer is: you can't end the stream. The HTTP protocol defines that sending a 0 byte is a valid final byte for the header (and the connection). So the stream will keep reading until a 0 byte is received, and the will always return 7bytes. The only way to stop the stream is to stop reading in PHP. // // Licensed to the Apache Software Foundation (ASF) under one or more // contributor license agreements.
