Overview of Tackling Stuck Emails Stuck (Tackling) emails (previously known as the Bootstrap) are an issue that commonly arises when users are unable to handle an automatically-sent email (a web-based email or a scheduled/scheduled email) in some way (some situation or environment). This includes: A user simply does not have an accessible email client, browser or email capable device, and as such is unable to access the email. A user does have an access to the email, but chooses not to open the email due to the user's email client, browser, or email device not being able to handle the number of recipients, the attachment size, the content or many other reasons. A user decides to access the email, but finds it too large or other issues with the email. A user is unable to access the email, they might be a spammer (or the associated email server might be blocking their message) or they might have been unable to access the email due to a server-side or routing issue. This can be caused by the intended recipient not being available due to being offline, or by the SMTP server being unable to reach the intended recipient due to a network configuration issue. Stuck emails can be caused by the intended recipient's email client not being capable of handling a number of emails, or a user's email client unable to handle a large number of emails. An example of a "Stuck" email is one where the user receives a number of messages sent by an email system administrator that are larger than the maximum allowed size
