Analysis of risk factors for thyroid eye disease. To evaluate the risk factors for thyroid eye disease (TED), a case-control study was conducted in 1991-2002 in Hangzhou, China. The cases were patients with TED, whereas the controls were recruited from a community-based cohort without thyroid diseases. The potential risk factors were analyzed by using logistic regression models. Fifty-two patients with TED (thyroid eye disease) and 99 subjects without thyroid diseases were enrolled in the study. The study included 57.9% men, with a mean age of 46.9 +/- 12.7 years. There was a significant difference between cases and controls for sex (odds ratio = 0.47, 95% confidence interval = 0.32 to 0.69). The most significant factors associated with TED were presence of eye pain (odds ratio = 3.73, 95% confidence interval = 1.51 to 9.22), eye itching (odds ratio = 1.55, 95% confidence interval = 1.04 to 2.32), eye swelling (odds ratio = 1.72, 95% confidence interval = 1.13 to 2.58), and family history (odds ratio = 2.32, 95% confidence interval = 1.48 to 3.63). The variables identified may be used to identify TED risk groups and initiate disease-modifying therapies for this debilitating disorder. The goal of this project is to develop and evaluate a computerized method for the prompt, individualized management of cancer patients who receive inpatient care in an acute care hospital. The instrument is designed to be administered in the hospital to subjects undergoing treatment for cancer. Its primary utility is to aid the
