W. Keller, Jr. However, this co-inventor apparently had no significance in later assignments and the application was revised (informally) to show Prusoff as sole inventor. The application was filed under Ser. No. 08/081,907, filed Jun. 21, 1993 and uses a "hot" underfilled type with annealed iridium conductors on a polymer substrate. The key new subject matter is an enhancement of the "hot" underfilled contact to form a low-resistance contact between the thin-film conductor and the substrate. This is achieved by first applying a layer of hard glass, the central part of which is a metallic oxide to the underfill, and then heating the glass at a temperature in excess of the melting point of the oxide so that the glass is pressed onto the underfill and the oxide mixed into the glass, forming the oxide-glass interconnecting contact. The central part is referred to as "glass" and the other part as "oxide" for convenience. Then the iridium is deposited on both glass and oxide parts. While the glass is being cured, the oxide part is heated to a temperature to form a soft solder-like oxide that is pressed onto the glass. After the oxide is thermally cured, the assembly is reheated to a

The area is known as a gem in a sliver of a state. And that's especially true for 20-year-old Brian Allen -- a music producer, rapper, rapper-producer and songwriter who found his way here by a series of coincidences and impetuous decisions. In October, Allen was sitting on his couch, watching old episodes of "Cheers" when he saw what appeared to be another episode, but from another time. The scene was set in Hillside -- and played in the bar where characters Norm, Cliff and Cliffie had been hanging out. "I just flipped out," he says. "It was just too real and too perfect." Allen contacted producers in New York and Los Angeles and told them about the series. That night, the producers and Allen started working on the idea of trying to find out what happened to the town in 1986. 'The Clique' According to Morgan and Hillside, 1986 was a pretty unforgettable year in the town. In August, just after the third season of "Cheers" wrapped, a group of teenagers beat a student to death. The town was shaken, and violence in the area continued to be a source of tension. The next episode in "The Clique" was set in October. But it wasn't just any October; it was October 1986, and it was a day full of last-minute holiday parties at The Clique bar.
