Its a normal situation, a new linux release, while it is released there is always a weeks delay in the latest USB versions of the kernel, its not uncommon at this point for a kernel release to have 3 or 4 different kernels in the same USB version. Usually there is a SMP kernel for headless systems (tablets, embedded,...) and a default kernel for desktop and more common use. The SMP kernel should be quite fast, because its only tasks are single-threaded. Yes, I have a political viewpoint. Yes, I know that is why you are all against me. -- Daring Newhard If you are actually using an SMP kernel or a custom-built SMP kernel on a Hainan Atom's, please post detailed configuration. Yes, I have a political viewpoint. Yes, I know that is why you are all against me. -- Daring Newhard I haven't got any stock version of the hainan, I put my own kernel on it to be able to use all of the cpu cmp options.I use the following command to boot the system: Code: zImage.tmk=/vmlinuz-smp First I get the i686 kernel, then I pass it the SMP kernel and use a zImage.tmk as apposed to a vmlinuz. I am using 4 cpu and a dual core atom, thus I have to use a SMP kernel and I compiled a kernel for the Atom, that is the reason for the "overclocking" parameter of the cmopts. I am not trying to get maximum performance out of the system, so it's not as critical to me, but if I really needed more performance I would simply use a more powerful system. The kernel I use is all for the headless systems, so the sysctl's that restrict the max clock speed of the CPU are no concern for me as long as I don't have to bother with hyperthreading. While using SMP you can't use any graphical utils on a multithreaded machine. So if you intend to use a Linux in a desktop environment you probably want to use a non-SMP kernel. The XenOpen kernel will not give you any advantages on it's own, except for the minor speedup of having your own copy of the hypervisor kernel. Even though
