Our main aim was to reach the very southern shore of the lake. It took us 6.5 hours (including a quick stop at the observation tower). On the south shore we spotted this white flag in the water: Still white when we got closer. There was no hiking to be done, it was all flat land and walking! Of course we would have to go on the land of the local cows. On one farm we saw these guanacos: (10) In the middle of this farm we found an old military balloon base: And, just to be on the safe side, we stopped on the local (very flat) hill to take some photos: After 3.5 hours we got to the place where the fence on the northern shore had been opened by a car. To our surprise we found this bush: Yes, this is an rarified bush, quite similar to, but more blue than, the species called "arctic azalea" ("Rhododendron lapponicum"). This is one of the more common species in southern Sweden, and we can find them in all open areas, and even on some roofs (but not on ours). The last part of our walk was to a point on the south shore. We had never seen this sign: It took us a while to find it, but it was nice to know the lake was also called "Blue Lake". On the shore we saw some tourist in boats. We told them about the discovery of the new rarified species: They were pleased to hear this! The guy with the camera in the photo was a nice guy and gave us a couple of their pictures. They told us they had spotted a couple of other species of the same genus.
