So much so that almost every day new companies are popping up to take the pain of a bitcoin purchase out of your hands. And yet, few of these companies offer what we see as the best of both worlds: a service that makes buying something as easy as buying something with regular money. There are some solutions out there, but it's not clear if they're good enough. The first wave of companies offering similar services will be allowing you to pay for their service with bitcoins. For instance, Budgets are arguably the best service in this category. All you do is buy them a coffee. Budgets matches you with someone who will let you pay them in bitcoin. The beauty of this model is that the cost of the coffee is fixed. Therefore, this model becomes more about adding value than a loss leader. The second wave of startups will actually sell you bitcoin on your behalf. You'll be able to connect your bank account to a company that will make the transactions when you ask them to. The beauty of this model is that the company will bear all the risk associated with buying and holding bitcoins for you. The third wave is simply an extension of the second wave. The companies are now listing bitcoins for you, they're just connecting your bank account to them. Which of the three is the better way to go? I'm going to assume that all three are fundamentally good ideas. There will be service providers that are only capable of making the first model work. With the second model, they will be limited in scope by not being able to sell bitcoins for you. They will also have to go through third party processors that stand in the way of transactions being processed quickly. Most, 595f342e71
