By "low voltage" I mean about 6V in total, which should be enough to power a USB-based phone charger. The output can source a maximum of 20A. The supply will be powered from a separate 12V power supply, via MOSFETs. So as long as the separate power supply can provide 12V, there's no problem. The circuit will have to be able to handle input voltages up to 48V, so it's not a low-voltage supply. In fact, it may be a high-voltage supply, but one that's designed to be completely unaffected by incoming voltage. For what I have in mind, the input voltage is likely to be AC, in the range of 5-30V. I'm hoping for some help identifying a suitable supply IC. One of the main issues for me is that I've never used power ICs before, and don't really know what to look for. Here's the list of things I'm looking for: Input/output regulation Resistive load protection Low leakage Low operating current Small footprint A: Try this one, with (or without) capacitors, depending on your application: In my opinion, it's not a good idea to put the regulator on board.
