This invention relates to a phase jitter measuring apparatus, and more particularly to a measuring apparatus for determining the phase jitter produced during transmission of a signal through transmission lines. It is generally known that jitter is produced in a high-speed bit or data signal when it is transmitted through transmission lines. The jitter thus produced is generally a source of noise, and it is therefore important to reduce the jitter. In view of this, the present invention is intended to provide a phase jitter measuring apparatus to determine or measure the phase jitter of the signal waveform under test. The lunch series is a regular monthly meeting on the first Friday of the month which begins at 12:00 noon. The series is typically in six sessions and is held at the Steamtown Mall, the Roosevelt Park kitchen at the center of the mall or there is now a permanent location (permanent location dependent on room occupancy). Lunch is free and open to the public. A meal is provided in the meantime. Each month there is different content. The lunch series is intended to educate and inform the public about STEAM subjects of the day. We are always looking for educators and/or community mentors to share their experiences and join our lunch series. Q: How can you use batch normalization for static image data? I'm trying to use Batch Normalization to reduce overall image intensity variance, but do not want to change the input images. Is this possible? If not, what could be another approach? Thank you! A: The input and output of batch normalization are of the same shape. You can however reduce the variance in the activation of batch normalization by introducing a trainable filter which operates on the activation. The filter can be optimized using stochastic gradient descent or any other appropriate optimization method. The input to the batch normalization and filter is the same and the filter is trainable. It does not use the input. Consider the following example: import tensorflow as tf # Input image input_image = tf.placeholder(tf.float32, shape=(1, 32, 32, 1)) # Output image output_image = 648931e174
