Complications and failure of transvenous pacemaker lead extraction and their relation to lead position. During the period 1982 to 1988, 173 (31.0%) of 559 patients referred for lead extraction by a cardiologist had a transvenous pacemaker lead. Complications that occurred during pacemaker extraction (peri-lead hematoma, necessitating reoperation or lead reimplantation; lead migration to the venous system or any body cavity, necessitating reoperation; and venous occlusion necessitating reoperation) were analyzed by lead position and by the nature of the underlying heart disease. The most frequent complications associated with pacemaker lead extraction occurred when it was performed from the right ventricle (41.5%), while the incidence of lead migration to the venous system or to any body cavity was higher when the leads were deployed in the vein of the right atrium (52.9%) than in the right ventricle (26.8%). The most frequent complication associated with lead extraction from the right ventricle was a peri-lead hematoma, which developed when the lead was crossing the tricuspid valve. These findings suggest that the incidence of failure and complications associated with lead extraction is related to the position of the lead in the venous system. The objective of this project
